Rationale Prescribed text(s)	Psychotherapy and neuroscience research conducted during the last two decades has consistently suggested that the therapeutic relationship between the counselling practitioner and client is a major predictor and determinant of effective therapeutic outcomes. This unit is the second of the units with an embedded practicum component and is designed to assist students to explore and assimilate important dimensions of what both counselling practitioner and client bring to the relational encounter of therapy in the context of their developing personal practice framework. This is accomplished through intentional and critical reflection on students' growing experiences of practice as it occurs within their individual practicum placements. Students will also examine several therapeutic relationship models, the various perceptions the major schools of counselling have of the therapeutic relationship and attachment theory. They will also continue to explore the implications of a Christian worldview as it applies to this relationship. Crawford, A. (2015). Conclusion. Unit summary

It has long been known that the therapeutic relationship is the very core of the counselling process. In this unit, students will explore both theory and practice of the therapeutic relationship and various theories and processes that influence this vital counselling connection as they begin to construct their own framework of counselling practice.
